Corning, N.Y. (P) - Atom specialists dealing with deadly radioactive material can get a cool view of their work through the thickest window in the world.

The window, nearly nine feet thick, is a radiation shield made for the Atomic Energy Commission by the Corning Glass Works.

Corning engineers say the win-dow has two purposes: its thick-ness protects workers looking at dioactive material and also reflects light in a way that provides a larger view of the working area. An object seen through the seven glass panes and 12 plastic sheets that make up the window will appear greatly enlarged.

Corning has manufactured a number of shielding windows for atomic research, some of them as peepholes into radioactive compart-ments in the Navy's atomic submarines.
