Easter 1968 It has been Good Friday and it has been Easter and it has been Passover

In no such religious week-religious by rite and calendar-has there been so much religion in the air, so deep a sensing of the religious experience in a people as in the American people this ster Week of 1968.

There must be no effort to make the parallels involved too explicit. Each reality, however much it seems to yearn and stretch itself toward another, remains in some sacred and sacrosanct compartment of its own. There must be no carelessly well-intended effort to apply the image from one to another. There need be no cross-referencing between the particular stories and cir cumstances by which the great master theme of suffering and redemption has been developed and unfolded. It would be better, if such possibilities cross the mind, to sit and meditate than to reach for the analogy, or frame the obvious question into specific words.

It is better just to wonder whether the theme of suffering and redemption could ever really have a central figure whose skin is of a certain color than it is to try to make some proclamation about an integrated God.

It is better to let the feelings of this week have their way inside us than to try to produce a doctrine that could be

But one thing may perhaps be proclaimed, and that is the same thing this editorial began with. Never before, we think, has there been a Holy Week in which the American people have had within themselves quite so deep a flowing of the rich, sad, yet beautifully nopeful mysticism always symbolized by the institutionalized ritual.

Let it flow, within us, and out from us, and on and on and on, toward good

This week, to the memory of the performance of Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy, America added the spectacle of Coretta Scott King, in whose classic face and noble bearing the hidden fluctuations of her personal grief were barely suggested while she carried through the obligatory performances of Such widows, observed the Springfield Union, "do more than distinguish themselves. By proving that grief can be borne with grace, they place in their debt all troubled people groping for strength and courage to bear their own
