Plot Costs For Budget

The household budget - blessing or bane for the newlyweds? Whichever way you regard it, it's a must; otherwise there's financial chaos.

The time for anticipatory budgeting is well before the wedding, so there's time to adjust to the fact that he always takes cabs when it rains, and that she wants to have h hair done weekly. Prepare for these revelations by sitting down together with a big sheet of paper. Noting income is a simple matter. The future expenses are the greater difficulty. Start with rent as a fixed expense. Food is a bit difficult but take a figure representing spends as single people, and cut it back about 30 per cent. Don't forget, as one young couple did, to allow for lunches unless you pack them at home, and sometimes rising young ex-ecutives don't go for the picnic Operational activities fall into several categories: Cost of running and maintaining a car; gas, electricity and phone bills; insurance on household goods and health policies (unless carried by the employer), and cleaning and repair bills. ure, these will be difficult to anticipate until housekeeping actually begins.

The clothing estimate should be a modest one because presumably the two have stocke their wardrobe in advance of the wedding.

Let Manchester Alert Itself Now

Let us hope that, from this time for ward, the good citizens and potential voters of Manchester will not forget that a controversial and most important proposal for change in the form of our municipal government may be on its way toward us.

Manchester has done well, for 21 years, in its effort to honor the principles of good business, rather than those of politics for patronage and power, in its conduct of its municipal affairs.

But there has never been a managercouncil, or Board of Directors-General Manager, form of government anywhere which has not had to be defended against sporadic efforts of new generations of politicians to head back toward the same conditions which were the disgrace and financial ruination of so many American cities.

Manchester, 21 years ago, reformed itself without needing any whip from scandal or from bankruptey. The results have been good. But, in recent years, there has been fairly consistent agitation, from some lusty political quarters, for a turn toward a "strong mayor" system.

The danger we warn against is not the danger that Manchester may come to the point where it has to make a choice between continuing the present managerial system, with its restraints on party politics, and heading for the concentration of all power in the hands of politically elected officials. If Manchester comes to such a decision with its eyes open, and fair enough.

The danger, on the other hand, is that a proposition being pushed by a minority will make progress because nobody but that minority shows any awareness of it or interest in it until the thing is suddenly before us for a decision which may be left to a minority of the voters If the push for a strong mayor charter is to begin now, then now is also the time for a defense of the managerial charter to begin, and it is, as well, the time for every Manchester voter to be gin taking notes and considering de cisions in his own mind. Let's not, a year or two from now, let our very form of government be changed

Suez Canal, Who Needs It?

Perhaps there are solutions, after all. Take, for instance, the long troublesome, war-threatening question of who should control the Suez Canal: History tells the story of Disraeli's bold, imaginative intrigue, and of how

Britain, for so many years, had to control Egypt in order to be able to be sure of controlling such a lifeline to its other We saw, in World War II, Rommel try to drive toward it, and the British de-

In 1956, it almost started another world war, when Britain and France, with. shadowy illusions of their former imperial vigors, tried for a moment to punish Egypt's Nasser for having had the temerity to declare that the Canal belonged to Egypt. We have since seen Nasser try to block Israeli shipping from the Canal, and haggle about the conditions under which the Canal, closed almost a year now since the war last June, might be reopened During this year it has remained closed, ownership of the Canal has certainly returned no great dividend for Nasser and Egypt. Now there appears in prospect a solution to the long, bitter, war-threatening problem of who shall control the Suez to go through the Canal anyway. This lay in shambles. . It is now being predicted that the Canal may never reopen. In that case, it will silt up, and cease to be a Canal In that case, it won't make any differ ence who owns it or who has the big gest battleships or air bases nearest it we must help each other." Nor, it would seem, would it make very much difference to the world's ship ping and the world's business.

It has managed to get along for year without Suez. This has involved some longer voyages around the tip of Africa, but it has also made possible the use of ships which were too large Canal were reopened. The Canal might not operate profitably again, if it were put back in shape. So we come to the point where we can almost ask, of the century long rivalry over control of the Suez Canal, who needs it?

A Fable About A City Once upon a time there existed in the western part of a small. Eastern industrial state, a rather sleepy, medium-sized city which —though it was the year 1968 was just beginning to catch up with the 20th Century. Still, it was not entirely the fault of of other large and small cities across the country, cities which had somehow been trapped in economic and social backwaters. It was not in any way a unique experience. What was unique, in this and other cities about the country, was that many people wanted to do something about situation. They wanted to rip down what was old and decaying and build anew. They wanted to invite new businesses and industries into the city, to lift the economic standards and eliminate unemployment. They wanted to get rid of old schools and replace them with new ones which would give their children the educational advantages which many of them had not had. .

The city, like so many others, had a special problem. Many of the unem-ployed and the undereducated nad black skins. They lived mainly in "their" section of town, which was distinguished chiefly by the dilapidation of its homes and its schools which were filled primarlly with black students.

The black people looked about them Are we not citizens of this great country and this progressive city? they asked. Why do we not live in decent homes, have good jobs, and send our children to the best schools? They decided, in the best American tradition, to seek political redress for the wrongs they felt were being inflicted on them. The politicians were very polite and made them many promises, but made good on only small things, after much delay and only then under extreme pressure. It took years, for example, to settle a simple problem like getting a black man in the Fire Department.

Still, men of good will persisted in their efforts. They knew that progress could not be delayed forever. They thought that one of the keys to the situation was, education. Educate the young, they said, and the future will take care

The city had a plan which was gathering dust on the shelf. It called for the building of huge educational complexes be room for recreational areas; there would be new school libraries and sci ence laboratories; there would be other facilities which would lend themselves to sharing and to new techniques in tean teaching. The plan was expensive, but many persons thought it was well worth the cost to turn it into reality.

Many of the people who lived in the comfortable homes objected. They wanted to continue to send their children to their "own" schools. The status quo was comfortable, and they liked it. These people feared that, when the new schools were built (or even if the schools weren't built), either their children would be bused to "other" schools or black students would be used to "their" schools They didn't much like the idea, if the blacks want to send their children to schools, they said, let them buy homes in "our" neighborhood. It was pointed out to them that sometimes i was difficult for blacks to buy or rent homes outside of "their" section of town. And, anyway, many of them couldn't afford to do so. Well, said the comfortable people, let them get jobs and earn the money to buy here -if they can -just as we had to. These people all want "something for nothing." Most of them are on welfare, anyway. It was pointed out to them that many of the blacks could not get jobs because they didn't have the proper educational

Well, said the comfortable people, let them get an education-if they can just as we had to.

It was pointed out to the confortable people that segregated education just didn't work, that the black students were falling farther and farther behind, and that soon they would not be able to catch up at all. Well, said the comfortable people, let them go to schools where they can get an education -- provided, of course, they are not "our" schools. And so the vicious The blacks became more and more restive. Younger, more militant leaders emerged, to the dismay of both black and white moderates. As the atmosphere became more hostile, white militants also moved to the fore. Violence became commonplace. The police were caught in the middle. The blacks thought they were too brutal; the whites thought they were too gentle. Soon, even more radical groups emerged on both sides. The radical lacks thought the only solution was to burn the city down and to start over. The radical whites thought the only solu-tion was to suppress the blacks completely. White vigilante groups offered their services to the city, to "protect" its board members and to "assist" the police. Officially, their efforts were reected. But unofficially they had the support of many of the white majority, who cheered them and exclaimed, "They're our boys! They're the only ones who will stand up to the blacks!"

Finally, all reason was lost. The inevitable happened. Whites fought blacks; blacks fought whites. The city The remaining blacks and whites realized that the only way to rebuild the city was to work together. "This is a disaster," they said. "We must get some outside help. But, more important A very wise, old man, who had been observing what went on in the city for some years, emerged from his home high on a hill and came down among
