Cool Rhetoric

The example of cool rhetoric in th by President Nixon and by the thousands of students who demonstrated in Washington may have come a little late, but it is a welcome change, nonetheless,

It would be pleasant to dream for a moment that it sets a pattern for future confrontations because President Nixon is not the only citizen who finds it difficult to sleep when he reflects on agoniz-stance of President Nixon's remarks at his Friday night press conference, it cannot be denied that there was a decided difference in the tone of them. Not once during the conference did that familiar accusing edge slip into his voice.

The questioners themselves, for that matter, seemed to avoid the accusatory queries which sometimes draw Mr. Nixon toward harsh answers.

What effect that tone - was it conciliartory or simply non-adamant? - has on the Saturday protest cannot be determined, but it must have helped.

The Commission report coins a phrase for this alternative, calling it "the antipolitics of the street."

This is a report written by Democrats vious that whatever significance it may have will be for the whole American po-into greater participation in the political processes of the parties, then that "antipolitics of the street" will continue to grow in its powerful threat to set the political processes aside and seize objectives for itself, voting with the bodies instead of with the fingers of its ad-

The specific recommendation of the McGovern Commission report would see o it that the representation in any party convention is carefully divided so as to be representative of almost every conceivable classification of people.

From what has been reported of these ecommendations in advance, however, they are so insistent on the creation of the democratic appearance that they violate the ordinary rules of the democratic process. There is even a possibility that some of us would consider the means by which they propose to guarantee "balance" and full "participation" in the political process somewhat dictatorial and totalitarian in nature. It follows, then, that Democrats who oppose these recommendations, and who try to defend the present modes and processes of party operation, are not necessarily all unscrupulous old guard politicians intent on keeping the political process a closed corporation inhabited and operated only by themselves for It could be that there is more potential real democracy in the present processes, which are, in reality always open to invasion and conquest any time those inside them offend enough people outside, than there would be in the contrived more open representation of the reform

The present system is always open to get in. Its deeds and policies always have to stand, in the end, by the verdict of all the people as the electorate. What happens by the natural laws of ambition and hard work may not look as pretty, theoretically, as some party convention which is made up of such and such a percentage representing the various age groups, another percentage repthe population, another percentage representing the different colors of skin etc. But'it might, nevertheless, contrive to be much closer to the wishes and the will of all the people than the perfect roster assembled by artificial selection.

In South Vietnam territory not only has to be conquered and occupied, it also has to be pacified. It will be no different in Cambodia.
