In war there is a price for everything The enemy always has some kind of an answer to every move. In this case the outlines of the answer begin to emergeand be highly expensive.

The forces which once used the "san tuaries" just inside the Cambodian fron tier were not captured, or routed. They simply pulled back beyond the line of quarters was in the pullback, and is currently operating as effectively as ever from just beyond the new line. And they took ample ammunition with them. With ample ammunition the enemy forces have not gone out of action: the

Before the move into Cambodia the Vietnam was was fought under a set of tacit ground rules. Under those rules the Vietnam and Viet Cong forces used a narrow strip of Cambodia which Vietnam. But they left the rest of Cambodia strictly alone.

In the rest of Cambodia life went along more or less in normal way. Tourists flew in and out and visited the great ruin at Angkor Wat. It was so safe and nor that the former Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy made the tour. She would hard y be comfortable in Cambodia today. Now, the whole of Cambodia is a checkerboard of changing battlefields The enemy forces strike in one place one day and another the next. There is no longer any possibility of normal life anywhere in the country. Its new government is presiding over instability. And Washington must face the anguishing question of what to do about this spon y state of instability.

There is a new White House dogma. American troops will be out of Cambodia by the first of July. There is no intention of sending them back (although Congress should not tie the President's hands by prohibiting it). The Cambodian Government will be helped by means other than American combat troops. But how much of such aid is to go?

What would be the effect of such aid on the military budget back in Washington? Would it really do any good, or merely disappear into the spongy instability of the country? Suppose Washington does embark on a massive and expensive program of aid to Cambodia, and the country ends up in the hands of the Army of North Vietnam? Will American prestige have suffered a damaging blow? Can Cambodia which may not succeed? All of these questions merely testify to the fact that while there may be a large

They can range farther, do more damage in more places, be less easy to locate. Saigon used to know exactly where they were. It will be less easy in the future. the best of reasons. In the court of God's justice, we stand before the bar of justice as guilty sinners. And yet God offers pardon to all of us. The people who accept it will be treated by God as if they were never guilty, as if they had never sinned.

Although God Himself offers the pardon to man, His justice is satisfied. The crime does not go unpunished. Someone else has offered to accept the guilt and to pay the penalty for the committed. Someone else has offered to satisfy the demands of God's justice. God, the Great Judge, has accepted the offer, and is extending the pardon to man. If he accepts it, man can go free. It is Christ who accepted the punishment for our sins. 'Christ died for the ungodly." (Ro-
