the United States. We must assume that the Soviets, as they view our placement of tactical nuclear weapons in countries far closer to their borders than Cuba is to ours, will seek to break out of the nuclear ring that has been drawn around

There hasn't been public language like that since the late John Foster Dulles was still primarily a churchman and had not yet become Secretary of State. Then, in an enunciation of principle he himself would soon be violating, he gently warned the policy makers of the nation that one nation's self defenses, if pushed too far forward under the nose another nation, would inevitably generate responses which would increase the danger in the relationship between the two nations.

This present language, however, is not something from a plous churchman, back in the days before we had begun to carry out our nuclear encirclement of

The normal, glib American view of any ring of American nuclear bases around Russia is that such an arrangement serves the Russians right, since everybody knows they are the potential aggressors on the world scene.

That proverbial, perhaps unfortunate ly non-existent man on Mars, could, if he were existing, be taking another view of the world situation. He might be deciding, from where he observed, that the world map down here would indicate, just from the geographical location of military bases, that it could be the United States which was the aggressor na-

We do not feel that way ourselves Our nearest approach to a reproach to ourselves is not for intent, but for the possibility that, in our nuclear strategy of self-defense, we may have overreached ourselves here and there,

But what the man on Mars might see, and what we might feel about what he saw, are both different from what the man inside Russia would be feeling, from his special national outlook.

He, like us, would be likely to have some faith in the peaceful intentions of his own nation. If, therefore, he found itself encircled, as Russia does find itself encircled by us today, he might have a relatively easy time of it concluding that the United States is the potential aggressor nation in this phase of world

To pose the desirability of such breadth of understanding on the part of Americans, to hall the demonstration of some such understanding on the part of a legislative subcommittee, is not, unfortunately, equivalent to finding a solution to the problem and situation involved. The situation and problem become their own prisoners.
