Whose Arms Kill Whom

States and to United States policies because it illustrates, once again, the risks involved in our role of armorar to so

We have absolutely no control over the use the army of West Pakistan is making of our weapons in its operation against the largely civilian revolt in East Pakistan. There is increasing evidence that American guns and American bullets have been involved in the slaughter of large numbers of civilians. In such an instance, our own guns and bullets are not, at least, being used against us, which is another thing that sometimes happens to armorers. But they are being used for purposes we cannot approve, and a touch of the blood they are spilling attaches itself to our national conscience, so that some of us are mildly disturbed. But our government, if one must guess at the truth, doesn't really want to know too much about what may be going on, or be forced into any stand which might mean it would have to threaten to give up

Our government, when it enters upon the role of ammorer to some other nation, thinks of two kinds of risks - one this risk now being demonstrated, that our arms may be used for some purpose of which we would not approve.

But the second risk our government always keeps in mind is the risk of what might happen if we do not supply the arms some other nation wants. This is the risk that if Pakistan, for instance, can't get arms from us, it will get them from somebody else, some other armorer, like, for instance, Russia.

It is this second consideration which usually proves compulsive, for our government. We would rather, for instance, have Pakistan using our guns against its own citizens than to have it using Russian guns against its own citizens. We would rather have both Pakistan and India using our guns against our guns, as they did a few years back, than have one or both of them using Russian guns.

The real cure we should be seeking isn't easy to find. Suppose, for instance, both we and Russia should make a fine agreement together that neither of us would supply any more arms to other nations. What would happen then would be that Britain or France or China or any number of smaller industrial nations would undertake to supply the market we and Russia might abandoning.

If we really want to find an answer, then, we are driven toward some idea. of world law about the sale and provision of arms by one nation to another. But this, when we began to analyze it, would put all non-industrial, agricultural nations at the mercy of nations which happened to have the raw materials and the power for an armaments industry of their own.

In the end, the best way for the United States and Russia to give up their roles as world armorers is to be ready to give up being armorers for themselves in other words, give up arms as a way

If we were really to try to give up supplying arms to Pakistan we might have to begin by denying ourselves the arms with which we are operating in

All the intricate fencing we and Russia are doing on questions of partial mutual limitation of armaments wouldn't even consider doing anything to interfere with our abilities to operate in Vietnam, or Czechoslovakia. Until it does, it won't mean very much

Some new kind of medal for unusual courage in an unusual situation should be struck off for Captain Aubrey M Daniel 3rd, the prosecutor in the Army court-martial of First Lieut, William L. Calley, Jr.

His action in writing to his President and Commander-in-chief protesting the wo interfering actions Mr. Nixon took, first in one capacity and then in the other, with regard to the Calley case may be an action which, for some, constitutes disrespectful insubordination. For others, it will seem that Mr. Nixon

"Not only has respect for the legal process been weakened, and the critics of the military judicial system been given support for their claims of command influence. The image of Lieutenant Calley, a man convicted of the premeditatunresisting people, as a national hero has been enhanced, while at the same time support has been given to those persons who have so unjustly criticized the six loyal and honorable officers who have done this country a great service by fulfilling their duties as jurors so ad-

April Snow

A snow in April is a little like the first snow fall of the season. It is something of a wonder, almost as refreshing to the senses as that first gust of flakes back in November. And, like a first snow fall, t vanishes almost as swiftly as it comes. Beyond that, it is a refreshing and beneficial kind of April shower, bringing its moisture down carefully to each given segment of ground, and then, instead of risking any quick runoff, applying it like a patient poultice, which melts and seeps its way solicitously down to each individual root.

As it then vanishes from the landscape, the April snow unveils new and deeper shades of green. The fused power of the daffodils reached another full week closer to bud, it seemed, while under the snow's brief touch. While we thought we were looking at a last fling of winter, the land underneath the snow was leaping ahead with spring.

"I Am In The Present" From the rarefled reaches of Diaghilev ballets to the "Ebony Concerto." for Woody Herman's jazz band, Igor Stravinsky's music brilliantly reflected what he said about himself: "I live neither in the past nor in the future. I am in the present, I cannot know what tomorrow will bring forth. I can only know what e truth is for me today." musical terms, the truth ranged from the riot-causing innovations of "The Rite of Spring" to a ceaselessly exploring spectrum including the purest classicism. After Stravinsky's passing this week, the whole world of the arts was rightly echoing such words as those by fellow composer-conductor Pierre Boulez: "The work of Stravinsky has been indispensable in the establishment contemporary language and style in

During recent years, the composer added to his repertoire several volumes of pungent comment in prose. Looking and acclaim, he saw himself in a perpective as disarming as the beguiling smaller pieces as he did along with the big ones: "I heard and I wrote what I neard. I am the yessel through which "The Rite of Spring")passed. . . I have been formed in part, and in greater and esser ways, by all the music I have was formed to compose." -CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
