Bad Game Plan For Okinawa

Back in March, when Chairman Wilbur Mills of the House Ways and Means Committee engineered his personal deal with the Japanese textile industry, he was, in one sense, encroaching on the privileges and authorities of the executive branch of government. His excuse for doing so was that he was getting a bargain from the Japanese, in their agreement to set voluntary quotas on their export of textiles to this country, and thus avoiding the dangerous legislative business of opening a new tariff law to all kinds of protectionist amended by Congressman Mills' initiative and informal exercise of the role of dealing with another country. President Nixon spurned as unsatisfactory the agreement Chairman Mills had negotiated. He had, nevertheless, no way to force Chairman Mills and Congress to legislate tariff restrictions against Japan, and the realistic result was that, for the time at least, Chairman Mills' informal bargain remained in effect.

But, although blocked from immeditive branch could and did move to con-

It was at this point that President Nixon announced that he planned to fulfill his agreement to return Okinawa to Japan by submitting the return to the Senate in the form of a treaty which would require a two-thirds vote for ratification.

What this amounted to in realistic political terms, understandable alike to those senators from textile states who would have an easy time, presumably, mustering the one-third plus one vote they would need to block the treaty and to the Japanese who want their territory returned to them, was to give American textile interests Okinawa as a bargaining point in their commercial war with Japan. And whereas Chairman Mills, in pursuit of his objective, had invaded the prerogatives of the executive branch. President Nixon, for his purposes, had done something quite the opposite. He had handed over into the power of the Senate a matter he could have quite depend upon the robin. properly handed himself, as an executive He is more bird per feather than any agreement.

We took possession of Okinawa by military conquest and by victor's dictate, and not by any vote of the Senate, and it should require no vote of the Senate for us to give back in time of peace what we took by force in the course of a war. One of the dangers of submitting the matter to the Senate is that it will indeed be stalled there, and that President Nixon will then be considered, by the Japanese, to be reneging on the pledge he made in 1969 that he would return Okinawa to Japan.

The President is also being warned that, if Japanese anti-Americanism is thus aroused, we may find ourselves pressured out of the military bases we have negotiated to keep not only in Okinawa but in Japan proper. This is a bad argument in its inference, which is that we should take care not to jeopardize our bases in Okinawa and in Japan, when the much more proper policy for Japanese-American relations, and for our own position in the world, would be one in which we ourselves were seeking to give these bases up as soon as possible. We need to get our military feet off foreign soil. If, instead, we persist in trying to stay on Japanese soil as long as we can, the question of whether we accomplish the return of Okinawa soon or late, by treaty or by executive agree ment, and with or without peace between the textile industries of our two countries won't make very much difference. We are helping Japan decide, today, what kind of world power it will try to be tomorrow. We would serve both nations, and the cause of peace, best, if we could see to it that Japan is free to make his own decision, not under the slightest pressure from a tariff faction in our Senate, or from an American military heel on Japanese soil.
