A Premier Apologizes For A Pilot Eisaku Sato is the Premier of Japan. second in power and prestige only to the Emperor himself.

The other day, a young and hitherto insignificant Japanese fighter pilot, with only 21 hours experience in the air, crashed into a giant passenger liner, causing the greatest air crash in history,

This week Premier Sato apologized for this, to the people of Japan. He apologized, he said, "from the bottom of my heart."

One reason a figure as high as the Premier felt compelled to do this, for an incident so very far below him in any chain of command or responsibility, was that proper apologies had not been forthcoming at lower levels.

The inexperienced fighter pilot, who caused the crash, but who himself parachuted to safety, somehow failed to show any particular regret or repentence. When he was arrested for his part of the action, he merely showed a good appetite and asked for some comic books. The next failure in the department of apology came from a higher level, and it involved the Director General of the Japanese Self-Defense Force which had put the fighter pilot in the air. He, as head of all Japan's military enterprise, was required to apologize to all the relatives of the victims of the air crash. He delivered the words of an apology, but he himself remained standing, and wearing shoes, when custom required that he should be barefoot and kneeling while making such an apology. These two failure of apologies at the lower level made it the more necessary for the Premier himself to take his own apologetic responsibility for everything, which he has now done. Doing so, he was not merely honoring

Japanese custom. He was also seeking to fend off special Japanese resentment against the air accident because the accident resulted from military activities anese life. One simplistic explanation of the air tragedy is that it is a result of Japan's turn back toward militarism. In the reality of things, this is something United States policy has been pressuring Japan to do, so perhaps the chain of apology should reach one rung still higher, with Washington presenting its regrets for providing the fighter plane in which rode the pilot for whose careless-
