Back To Face The Known

Midway through the mission of Apollo 15, we now find it safe to confess, our anxiety over the reliability of the flight and communications system which extended 250,000 miles out from earth and back began giving ground to a new kind

We began to have a slight degree of worry over the dependability of the even more important earth-umbilical from which Astronauts Scott and Irwin were dangling themselves across the surface of the moon.

There might come a day, we began to think, when there would be Astronauts who would no longer hold close to the confines of their assignment, or acknowledge the continuing authority of the homeland, or submit to the earthoriented discipline which alone can program the journey of return.

One did not need very much imagina tion, during the Apollo 15 Roverings, to detect the beginning of the warfare, to notice the first few tuggings back and forth on the long cord of will, of belonging, which stretched between Houston and all its voices represented, and the bouncing figures up on the moon, and all the siren-like temptations it was beginning to offer.

On the moon, the strains upon the link appeared in the form of that sight-seeing euphoria which could not resist gather ing a few more samples, snapping a few more pictures, moving out few more steps, delaying five minutes longer, as if there were no limits of time, supply, storage capacity or endurance.

Up from earth came the perpetua naggings, ranging from the motherly, the housewifely, the comradely, on to tenser moments of barely disguised invocation of establishment authority. One guessed that the Astronauts were being assigned more than they could possibly accomplish, in order to keep them from the dangerously relaxed mood which always seemed to be stealing toward them. Their routines seemed designed to keep their minds even busier than their hands and feet. Houston had to im-When they were tampted by a large rock which might prove too much for them, Houston talked them back to smaller samples nearer the Rover. At the end of the first day's exploration, Houston had to say, "Dave and Jim, we want you to move back toward the LM now." This, and the other nearcommands of the interplanetary dialogue ("We're ready for you to get back to the Rover"), together with the incessant reminder of detail to be accomplished ("Dave we assume you're dusting and cleaning now"), were all together woven into a gently pressuring, gently reassuring, never letting go system of care and maintenance for the long assumption of will and loyalty which tretched between earth and its explor-tion holding, of its own voluntary trength, when one of the Astronauts would say, of a sample whose classificaion had him momemtarily baffled, 'We'll check it when we get home." But one could feel the psychological imbilical going suddenly taunt when Scott said to Houston, out of that long listance, "Why don't you just give us bout five minutes with no comment and let us cool it for a while." For every generation of explorers

there comes a moment when the getting back, the accustomed authority, the dusting and the cleaning seem almost erialist powers, how about that ex iting development down in Washington tself the other day, when enterprising Republican Senators inveigled Henry Kissinger and Senator J. William Fulright into the same room?

They had to choose a room in Fuloright's own house to do it, because only in such informality could Dr. Kissinger take part in such a meeting without compromising the idea that White House staffers must continue to enjoy a certain mmunity from direct scrutiny and official questioning by the members or committees of Congress. But once they found a private room they could both enter, it was right away Henry and Bill, or at least it was Henry right eway, and the chorus of Benators who listened in were ecstatic over the ordiality, frankness, and informativeness of the discussions which took place, man to man, and apparently without interpreters as is sometimes possible when summitry is taking place etween two Americans.

What if, about the time President Nix might be agreeing with Premier Chou Enlai for an exchange of ambassadors, there should also be an establishment of diplomatic relations between the White House and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee?

One thing we New Englanders have to hope, as we contemplate our vulnerability to this kind of tilt, is that Callofrnia stays in one piece, and doesn't let any the Pacific. That would obviously lighten the western side of our continent so much that New England would dip right under waves, probably to such a degree that the new line of shore cottages would probably follow the contours of Minne-

Progress on School Renovations

These three photos show the work in progress at (top to bottom) Nathan Hale, Keeney St. and Robertson Elementary Schools, which are undergoing renovations and additions under a $1,997,000 bond issue approved by town voters last November

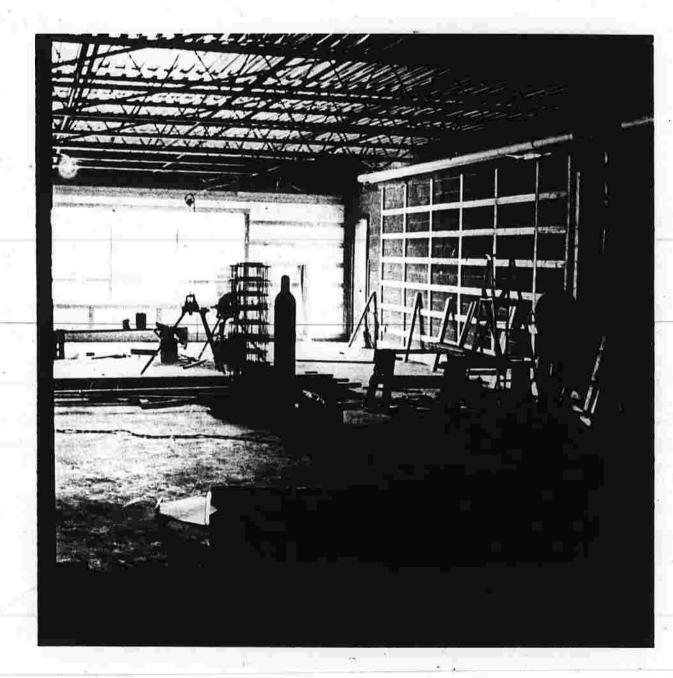

The architect on all three projects is Mankey Associates of Manchester, and the general contractor is Bartlett, Brainard and Eacott of Bloomfield. Construction began early in April. The view of Nathan Hale is from the rear. Walls and steel in the foreground are rising in what will become the cafeteria at ground level, with an open space Grade 1 and pre-primary wing above. Out of photo to the right will be a new auditorium

The new construction at this school is about 10 per cent and scheduled for mid-winter combuilding, which is being entirely will not be ready for September as planned. The interior photo shows an open space group instruction and primary unit at Keeney, where furring of the interior walls is underway. The 9-room addition at this school is 11/2 months ahead of schedule and may be ready by mid - Sep-

At bottom, old Robertson building in the background is viewed from the rear. The new addition in the foreground will house 12 intermediate classrooms and a media center. Two indergarten rooms are also being built in the space between the old building and the 1966 addition. Work here is on schedule for January completion.
