On Balancing The Payments

The international monetary system, and the International Monetary Fund are at an interesting crossroads. The recent United States moves to defend the American balance of payments have brought to the fore the need to reform our international monetary sys-

There is no question that action was eeded. Our balance of payments for 1971 will show a deficit in the current account (trade in goods and services) for the first time in the 20th century. A country can attack such a deficit in one of two basic ways: By changing the value of its currency and thereby becoming more competitive, exporting more and importing less - or by affecting the flow of goods and services directly. Included in this latter category are such weapons as tariffs, subsidies to exporters, and restrictions on tourist spending overseas.

During the 1930's, especially, nations defended themselves without recognized rules of cooperation such as those established in 1944 by the creation of the Inthe General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. It was common practice to engage in competitive devaluation - to make the goods of one country cheaper than another - and to have trade wars by erecting tariff barriers. The creation of the IMF entailed fixing rates of exchange of one currency into the other. The stability of exchange was seen as a welcome escape from the autarky of the pre-war period and an incentive to trade and investment. A country could count with some assurance on the value of other nation's currencies.

The outcome could be either a stronger system of international financial and monetary exchanges, including the benefits of trade with and investment in other countries, or a return to beggar-my-neighbor policies. A rise of economic nationalism would hurt everyone. International trade would diminish.

The President has imposed the surcharge as a bargaining weapon, especially against the Japanese, to obtain concessions. That is precisely why countries engaged in competitive devaluation and established restrictive tariffs during the 1930's. And the measures adopted then were always "temporary" but of indefinite duration. Responsible economists all over the country have urged The Nixon administration has an op-

It all started with a simple idea. Most people don't like service charges on their checking accounts. The Coolidge Bank, in Watertown, sought to gain customers and serve the public at the same time. So it defied some of the relatively larger and older Boston banks and announced the $100.00 minimum no-service charge checking account. As long as an account had $100.00 or more over a month's period, one could write as many checks as he desired without cost.

The others resisted. But the customers liked the idea and showed their approval in very tangible terms. Coolidge set up branch offices and prospered. The competition paid the ultimate compliment of emultation, hoping both to save their customers and capture some of the benefits of the new system. The $100 minimum account became a standard

But in an era of consumer interest, there is no question but that the public has benefited from this modern example of building a better mousetrap. And the innovation has probably caused some discomfort to the other banks in the Boston ward, and it is only fitting that this bank reap the benefits of its ideas and prosper. But within limits, please. It would be both an irony and a shame if Coolidge grew to the size and conservatism of its rivals. We need both the little guy and the better idea in this
