A Choice Of Theories One thing an editorialist can do, in times like this, is to give readers a choice of a series of interpretations, for them to accept or reject, taste or sample or discard, cafeteria style, according to their own instincts.

This is a process which may show how clever and inventive the editorialist is without ever requiring him to stake his reputation on the acceptance or rejection of any particular theory. There is, for instance ,the theory that both President Nixon and Russia share the same military and political appraisal of the situation in Vietnam, this being an appraisal which says that the current North Vietnamese offensive has revealed the utter incapacity of South Vietnam to defend itself, so that the next North Vietnamese surge is likely to produce something close to total collapse. By this theory, President Nixon, facing this disaster, has combined the greatest and most dramatic show of force he could manage, short of the atomic bomb, with ously set out by Hanoi. Nobody, the idea. would be, could then fault him for not doing his utmost to save Saigon. As for Russia, the idea is that Russia has the situation figured the same way, and therefore feels no need to take unusual action to defend its own big power dignity and prestige against the Nixon blocksince Nixon will soon be in much more trouble than even Russia might Russia's inaction in the face of Presi-Senator Goldwater says, Russia always respects power, which means that the way to deal with Russia has always been to be tough. If the editorialist could bring himself to believe this, he would have to sit himself down and compose an editorial in praise of cowardice, and point out the debt all humanity owes to the fact that one big power has sense enough to be too frightened to take the next possible step toward world holocaust. It might be a happy and praiseworthy situation which finds one great antagonist tough and courageous and the other soft and cowardly, a situation deserving commendation for both sides, especially if anyone thinks of what the result might be if both sides happened to be tough and courageous.

Another theory available, this one over in the cold salad department, offers the dismaying possibility that foreign offices and statesmen may not know much more than we do about what they are doing, or have any policy theories to which they feel themselves committed from one moment to the next. In other words, they are awaiting the next development in a situation and mood not much different from ours, except that they are likely to know it, when it develops, a few mo-

Still another theory offers us the pleasant assumption that Russia is glad we took such action to spank Hanoi because Russia is angry with Hanoi. Russia is angry with Hanoi, this theory goes, because Hanoi's present offensive was launched against Russia's wishes and represented a direct repudiation of Russia's advice to Hanoi, Therefore Russia is not adverse to having us show Hanoi the folly of its ways. It may protest in public, for the record, but won't really, except by potential peace-making diplomacy later on, do anything to help Hanoi out of its self-invited trouble.

There is another theory which says from his Navy days have indicated, the world's best poker player, and currently proving it by an expert, beautifully atuned game of raising the ante and making the big bet at the precise momen and in the precise way he had some unexpectedly good chance of getting away with it. This might be the theory which almost all of us would rush to embrace, f we had any real idea that it had valid and if they decide, of any one theory, they like it, they can try it. One other alternative we might recom mend to us all, no matter what theory might please us. The Christian Science Monitor the other day, in a front page editorial, suggested prayer. We would define prayer as a process which begins with human beings looking first into their own hearts, to discover what is there, before they bother Anybody Else.

evidence to the effect that another Connecticut town, of size and situation perhaps comparable to Manchester, now maintains a similar office with such and such a number of personnel. The first thing to say about this kind of towns its size, it could even cut down

The second thing to say about this kind of argument is that, whichever way it may cut, it ought not to be conceded any real importance. What has become the practice in other towns may, conceivably, contain good counsel for Manchester; it may, one the other hand, merely reflect some softness in spending or some flowering of the political patronage system Manchester can well do without.
