The Offer To India

The contest Russia and the western world cannot avoid, the contest which must run its course even though the world has the eyes of every seer's eye is going to be between the western world's spread of the privileges and blessings of freedom and democracy and the appeal of communism to those who see no better kind of change possible for themselves.

Lat democracy and the freedom stand still let them be static and content within their present quality and their present confines, and communism will constantly be invited to surge forward with its desperate brand of "freedom."

It is for this reason that the latest version of Britain's offer of independence to India must be regarded as perhaps the most important of all developments in this area of crisis.

The new version of the British offer by Prime Minister Attlee is distinguished from previous offers by its lack of reservation and conditions. It extends to the people of India the full choice of freedom, within or without the British Commonwealth of Nations, as they may desire.

Even the Indians themselves are aware that Britain really means it, this time, that Britain is through with the process of easily accepting internal division in India itself as an excuse for postponing freedom.

The Expensive Way. It is probably not entirely accurate to claim, as so many commentators are doing in the wake of the settlement of the General Motors strike, that the strikers were completely in error because they would have had, without interruption of work and income, the same settlement arrived at by the Ford and Chrysler agreements.

General Motors was certainly a major factor in the strike, but its members are doing in the wake of the settlement of the General Motors strike, that the strikers were completely in error because they would have had, without interruption of work and income, the same settlement arrived at by the Ford and Chrysler agreements.

Our Tradition Against It. Senator Brian McMahon, long advocate within his own committee of the view that a civilian commission should have top say over the development of atomic energy in this country, has announced his intention of carrying the right for his point of view to the floor of the Senate.

President Truman, standing by his guns in a right cause for once, has reaffirmed his own position in favor of top civilian control.

But the bill which will come to the Senate floor for debate will apparently be the Vandenberg bill, in which the military are given the dominant control of what ever atomic progress this country will make in the future.

What are the basic issues involved in this controversy? One basic issue, and much the lesser of the two, is that America will be saying something to the outside world when it chooses a system of domestic control for atomic energy. If we give that control to the military, we will be saying that this country chooses a militaristic future.

Plans Series Of Meetings

If we give top control to civilians, we will be saying that our intentions with regard to atomic energy are peaceful intentions.

But the importance of our choice to the outside world is a minor matter compared to the importance of our choice to our own future.

For if we give top control of atomic energy to the military, we will be violating a tradition as old as our nation itself. It is not only a tradition, but a sacred tradition.

But now, when we come to a matter which is more important than arms or navies or planes or guns, now that we face the issue of handling the most terrible and powerful weapon the world has yet created, now it is proposed to make an exception of our tradition and abandon our safeguards and give the military what amounts to a blank check to do what it pleases.

Major George Fielding Eliot, military expert of the New York Herald Tribune, discussed this issue through the world's eyes.

"The control of atomic energy," he wrote, "affects the future safety of every citizen of the United States. American atomic policy must, therefore, be kept under the control of the people of this country through their duly elected servants."

Then, discussing the apparently successful efforts of Major General Leslie R. Groves, head of the Manhattan Project, to use the Canadian spy stories in order to create hysteria among members of the War Relocation Authority.

"It is our lives you are playing with, general. It is our country's future, and we are playing with it. We have no objection, to continue to have these affairs of ours controlled under the arrangements we have found satisfactory for the past century and a half—the arrangements set down in a constitution for their own freedom."

Even the Indians themselves are aware that Britain really means it, this time, that Britain is through with the process of easily accepting internal division in India itself as an excuse for postponing freedom.
